The educational philosophy of the Graduate School of Veterinary Science is to cultivate human resources who can play an active role as leaders in Asia and the international community by combining knowledge, insight, and skills in the fields of veterinary and animal life sciences. To this end, our educational program ensures that students develop a broad perspective, deep insight, and high ethical standards in three fields: the Division of Structural and Functional Biosciences for Animals, which deals with human and animal biotechnology, such as drug discovery and safety evaluation of chemical substances, and their increasing social demands; the Division of Veterinary Environmental Sciences, which includes livestock health, food safety, and zoonosis; and the Division of Veterinary Clinical Sciences, which includes diagnosis, treatment, and prevention for animals with diseases. Therefore, the Graduate School of Veterinary Science is looking for students and professionals from Japan and abroad who have:

1. Sufficient basic academic ability to learn a specialized field of veterinary science;
2. Broad knowledge in the field of natural sciences, logical thinking abilities, and an inquisitive spirit to learn on their own;
3. The strong will to take up an instructive position in veterinary science and a willingness to exercise leadership both at home and abroad in the future;
4. An abundance of humanity, cooperativeness, internationalism, and a sense of ethics necessary as a person engaged in the field of veterinary science;
5. The English-language and communication skills necessary for research activities.

The Division of Veterinary Environmental Sciences is offering an international course to train “Professionals in Food Safety and Zoonosis.” All lectures in this course shall be conducted in English, and the course may be taken only in English.
